

Recent advances in the comprehension of the personality of Guglielmo Marconi

Gabriele Falciasacca
Emeritus Professor, Alma Mater Studiorum University of Bologna

In the Library of Oxford University a typescript was present clearly dictated by Guglielmo Marconi which describes the activity of the Italian inventor in the years from 1895 to 1899, years very crucial for his activity. The material was not prepared for publication but only for private use in view of future purposes. So, some parts are in fact unpublished. From these pages it is possible to have an insight of the private thoughts of Marconi and of the intuitions which were at the basis of his courageous experiments.

In the speech some important points will be illustrated which enable us to have a more complete comprehension of the personality of the inventor and his ability to forecast the future applications of his invention.
